Monthly egg-laying activity was recorded. Daily temperatures were set at 28 degrees C (nighttime) and 17 degrees C (daytime). Monthly temperature and photoperiod were either 17 degrees C-10:14 hours (long), 17 degrees C-13:14 hours (intermediate), or 28 degrees C-14:14 hours (short) at day length. Bar = ± 5 eggs/month. Results from data collected at 1 of 20 sites and replicated five times are shown. We report the syntheses and fluorescence properties of a dimeric coumarin (C9) that contains a flexible short linker and two coumarin chromophores attached to a common DNA-binding strand. The interstrand interaction of C9 with DNA can be tuned by varying the length of the linker (4, 9, or 17 aa). The fluorescence properties of C9 are different for the free (monomeric) and bound (dimeric) states. The fluorescence quantum yield of the monomeric form is much higher than that of the dimer. In contrast, the fluorescence quantum yield of the bound dimer is lower than that of the corresponding monomer. The fluorescence quantum yield of the DNA bound C9 dimer is lower than that of the bound C9 monomer because of the quenching of the fluorescence by the DNA-bound C9 dimer. However, when the linker length between the two coumarin groups of the dimer was longer, a similar fluorescence quantum yield of the bound dimer was observed as that of the bound monomer. The binding constant of C9 dimer to DNA was determined to be $5.12 \times 10(3)$ M(-1) by emission titration, indicating that the increase of the linker length between the two coumarin groups of the f678ea9f9e
